Delay On The Western Front

With every item of news coming from Europe wrapped in the strictest censorship, speculation is rife as to the actual state of plans of England and France to overthrow what they designate as "Hitlerism." We, like the rest can only guess. However, we do venture the opinion that England and France do not wish to employ battles and air fights to begin hostilities next spring, and that they will mark time on the western front as long as they can. The background of that opinion is that England and France were so far behind Germany in war preparation at the time of "Munich" that they dared not fight, but ever since then they have been re-arming feverishly. Their armies are doubtless ready now, but their aviation needs a few more months to "catch up." By spring, with the addition of what planes they can purchase in America, and with what airplane factories they can establish in Canada, they will be ready to meet Herr Goering's air fleet with reasonable assurance of success. As to, as major hostilities start on the western front, no airplane plant in England, France or Germany will be safe.

In a quick war at this hour, the advantage lies with Hitler. Every week's delay will see the advantage shift. Therefore, it is our opinion, that no news of major activity on the western front is good news for the democracies.

Old Ways Persist

That the coming of television means the doom of preaching is a fear expressed at a Bible conference in Virginia by a prominent member of the Pittsburgh ministry. The Rev. Bernard C. Clausen told the delegates that, in his opinion, "the preacher will be released to do the real work of the minister, according to the New Testament conception—to meet the queries of the people, to guide their thinking, to do a real job or religious education and to direct the experiments of bringing people to a real Christian experience."

Dr. Clausen's vision of the pastor's work in the world coincides with the view of these persons, whether parishioners or not, who, by close contact with the clergy are in a position to know the vital importance of labors of ministers, in and out of their churches and parishes. But his prediction of the revolutionary changes to be brought about by television, reminds one of the dire forecasts of those who saw in the brisk development of the movies and the radio the end of many good old things, among them books and plays.

But books and plays refuse to yield to the newer inventions of mankind. Literature and the theatre are old but ever new. The competition is keener but the fittest survive. What television may come to mean to America and the world is not yet known. It is in its experimental stage. But even if it realizes the fondest hopes of its sponsors, it would not be going too far afield to prognosticate that old ways when good will somehow persist.

Presidents and Vice-Presidents At Odds

(From Winchester Star)

Half the country knows that there is not the community of feeling between President Roosevelt and vice-president Garner which existed when the two first came into office. That the two chief statesmen of the nation remain personal friends is not questioned but that their political views are a variance on some points is well known. Vice-president Garner belongs to the Right Wing of the Southern Democrats and, it is constantly asserted, is less than a whole-hearted New Dealer.

That there is a definite campaign to bring about the nomination of Mr. Garner at the next Democratic National Convention over Mr. Roosevelt himself or the man of his selection is an open secret. Recently John L. Lewis, head of the C. I. O., gave the Garner candidacy a popular boost by attacking the vice-president on the ground of his personal habits, the sort of attack on the American electorate usually resents. Lewis called him an "evil old man." Word reaches Washington that the Garner henchmen, realizing that such an attack is calculate to wi rather than lose support for a candidate, are organizing Evil Old Man Clubs a. Garner organizations all over the country. Opinion of the president openly has declared his support of the Texan's candidacy.

But this is a very peaceable and mild diversion, as between president and vice-president, when compared with the rivalries which existed early in the history of the United States. One of these became so bitter as to cause the resignation of a vice-president, John C. Calhoun, and this at a period when a by-word of politics was that "few die and none resign."

Rivalry between the president and the vice- president started in the very first administration. John Adams thought that he should be the first president. When George Washington was still a quiet planter in Virginia, Adams was active advocating the rebellion or the colonies. He antedated Washington as a revolutionary leader. He led the debate which resulted in the Declaration of Independence. True, he strongly supported the proposal in the Continental Congress to make Washington Commander- in- Chief, but, throughout, he was inclined to think of Washington as a soldier, rather than a statesman and of himself as more fitted to heid the Nation once war had ceased.

As Washington had become the idol of the Nation and remained so until well into his second term when his popularity began to wane, Adams' bitterness was not vocal, but the fact is clearly attested historically that he an dWashington never got along. They saw as little of each other as possible and, even on official matters, dealt rather at arms' length.

The electoral system was different then. There was no question of nominations by party conventions. There were parties but no party systems and no party discipline. The man who received the highest number of electoral votes was president and the man receiving the next highest was vice-president. So it was possible that President and vice-president should not be running mates, as now, but rivals from the very first.

The bitterest of all situations came, however, when John Adams did become president and Jefferson vice-president. The basic economic rivalry of th day was between the planters and farmers and the class indiscriminately classed as merchants. Adams, the New Englander, was regarded as a leader of the merchant class, while Jefferson was the leader of the planters the farmers, and the frontiersman.

It is difficult today to comprehend the intensity of feeling which prevailed. The people of today have known nothing like it. Newspapers said things in those days which would bring blushes to modern editors and readers alike. Even the old hero idol, George Washington, was called names which make such a term as "evil old man" sound like an endearment. Thomas Jefferson, vice-president of the United States, was openly accused of plotting with the French to bring about a regime here similar to that of the French revolution. Citizen Genet, minister of the French revolutionary government, publicly stated that president Adams was a traitor and he, as an alien, a French Revolutionist, appealed to the American people over the president's head. Mr. Adams had some reason to suspect that this was with the approval of vice-president Jefferson, although the suspicion doubtless was groundless. At any rate it was too much for the old New Englander, who handed Genet his passports.

Then came the bitter rivalry between Jefferson, when he became president, and Aaron Burr. Here, again, it was a question of rivals rather than party running mates being elevated to these closely related offices. One of the most tragic chapters in American history formed a part of the strife in politics of that period when Burr shot Alexander Hamilton in a duel on the heights of Weehawken.

The most notable case of rivalry between a president and vice-president, following the rise of the party system, was that between president Andrew Jackson and vice-president John C. Calhoun. Calhoun's story is fascinating as it contains a sort of embodiment of the whole controversy, having foundations on social and economic conditions which later tore the Republic asunder in the throes of Civil War, a controversy which, to this day smoulders in the embers of many a political issue.

John C. Calhoun was the first champion in Congress of State's rights. He bitterly opposed the protective tariff and led what is known as the Nullification movement.

The cleavage between Jackson and Calhoun became so sharp and severe that service could not longer be shared, and Calhoun became the only vice-president ever to resign.

Later he became secretary of state in president Tyler's cabinet, and then a senator from South Carolina.

These early bitternesses are unlikely to recur. It is not that the American people are less interested in politics; it is that they have become a little less violent.
